15 March 2019 was one of New Zealand's darkest days.
An emergency response from the Domain Name Commissioner

This extraordinary and unique set of circumstances has required us to develop an emergency response to keep the .nz domain name space a safe one.
An exceptional response, when all of these are all at play.

- There has been a violent terrorist attack in New Zealand.
- The national security alert level has been set at “High.”
- There is content the Chief Censor has deemed “objectionable material” under the FVPC Act 1993 relating to the attack in circulation on the Internet.
- There are domain names that have been or could yet be registered in the .nz ccTLD contemporaneous with or recently following the attack.
- Some of these domain names may be assessed by DIA or CERT NZ to be primarily intended to propagate the “objectionable material.”
- The authorities involved in enforcing the legislation have sought DNCL assistance in limiting access to some domain names.
- The terms and conditions of registration of a .nz domain name require the registrant to not use the name for unlawful purposes, and registrars may cancel names where this is not followed.
Our emergency response.

- In the wake of the attacks, we were in regular touch with the Department of Internal Affairs.
- We communicated with ccTLD managers globally.
- We monitored domain name registrations on a daily basis.
- We did all that we could to deal with the immediate situation.
Thank you.

Chief Executive of InternetNZ
